The Office of Environmental Health Hazard Assessment (OEHHA) will be convening two one-day public workshops as part of its ongoing efforts to elicit and collect ideas about future environmental challenges which may confront programs in the California Environmental Protection Agency in the next five to ten years.

Workshop participants will identify possible emerging environmental issues, explore trends relevant to environmental quality, and examine the potential implications of these trends for environmental protection in California.

Ideas from the workshops will be added to those already collected to date under the Emerging Environmental Challenges Program, and presented to Cal/EPA policy-makers for their consideration in developing future plans for their programs.
